

Thursday, September 11, 2008

High quality, copyright free images for use in publications

Sometimes you need a picture that you can use in published materials. There are lots of free sites available but if you are struggling have a look at Alamy.

This valuable new picture resource for teachers, lecturers and academics has been launched by Alamy, the largest stock photo site on the web. Its Limited Use scheme offers access to the world's largest online collection of photographs from as little as 60p per image and without the worry of copyright problems.

Alamy currently has millions of images ready for use under the scheme and the choice will keep growing as its encyclopaedic collection continues to increase in size. File sizes range from a thumbnail to print quality sizes.

And, unlike many of the images taken from reference sites such as Google, the photos on Alamy are all copyright safe and high quality. Rachel Wakefield, Head of Sales:

"The beauty of this scheme is that it gives the education community an affordable and safe way of using photographs without compromising on choice. They can be used for all sorts of classroom projects, presentations, lessons and lectures, dissertations and theses.

"Many teachers use images free from the internet but, all too often, they are not aware of the copyright implications. Alamy is offering a large, top quality pool of images that are legally covered and cost from only 60p per photograph."

Please note that the collection is not edited for children and is aimed for teaching staff only.

To find out more visit: <http://www.alamy.com/help/stock-photography-limited-use.asp>

Posted by RossA at 18:43 in Resources | Permalink

Digg This | Save to del.icio.us